

Web Search Engine

Contributed by Zak Scharfen
Sunday, 18 June 2006
Last Updated Monday, 31 July 2006

What do you consider to be the greatest invention of all time? Is it the wheel? Okay, let's not be ridiculous. Although the wheel has its place, there are other creations that seem incomparable. I've heard folks say that the television is the most amazing innovation since it works as a mass communication device, but also entertains beyond the capabilities of the radio. I can see the praise. However, how can anyone choose one invention and deem it the best form of technology? For me personally, it's impossible. Although the computer is certainly at the top of my list. When it comes to home computers, they just offer us so much connection. The World-Wide-Web has provided us with limitless possibilities. How often do you use your PC or Mac? These nifty little machines grant us with so many conveniences. I'll never forget the first time I popped open a web search engine.

What web search engine do you use? Most of us prefer a certain one in order to surf the web. Back in the day when net surfing became a phenomenon, Yahoo.com was like the biggest thing around. Everyone was talking about investing in this new-age web search engine. These days there are several ways to browse cyberspace. In fact you have a number of search engines to choose from. Anything from Webcrawler to Askjeeves to Lycos to Google to MSN to Hotbot can be used to locate that special website. Now, the question is; how do you decide on a particular web search engine? Well, the way I settled this was trying them all. I used to love popping open new search engines and surfing for my favorite products or for my car safety devices. In the end I made a decision on which one worked the best, hence provided me with the best selection of products and deals. For me this web search engine was Google. Keep in mind this was back in the late 90s. Back then Yahoo was still all the rage. Now days Google.com is probably the most used web search engine around. Yahoo and MSN follow close behind. Have you found that particular item or data via the Internet? Well, maybe you should try a new web search engine. You'll soon notice that different results can be found with various engines. Regardless of your web search engine of choice, one thing is for sure, the Internet remains the best place to look. Get online today and browse with a variety of search engines in order to find your favorite one.